Its function was to hold the Minotaur, a mythical creature that was half human and half bull and was eventually killed by athena hero Theseus. Daedalus had been so cunningly making Labyrinth that he could barely escape after he built it. Theseus is helped by Ariadne, who gives him a skein thread, literally clew, or clue, so he can find his way out again. In everyday English, labyrinths are generally synonymous with labyrinths, but many contemporary scholars observe the differences between the two: the labyrinth refers to complex branching puzzles with a choice of paths and directions; while the maze of one lane has only a single, non-branching path, which leads to the center. The maze in this sense has an unambiguous route to the middle and back and is not designed to be difficult to navigate. Although early Cretan coins sometimes showed multicursal patterns, the classic seven-course unique design became associated with the Maze on coins as early as 430 BC, and became widely used to represent the Labyrinth – although descriptions of logic and literature made it that the Minotaur is trapped in a complex branching maze. Even as the design becomes more complicated, the visual depiction of the Labyrinth from Roman to Renaissance is almost always familiar. The branching maze was only reintroduced when the garden maze became popular during the Renaissance.Chambers 20th Century DictionaryLabyrinthlabi'rinth, n. a place filled with inevitable winding. (orig.) a building consisting of a hall connected by intricate passages: the arrangement of winding parts where it is difficult to find a way out: unexplained difficulties, confusion: (anat.) internal ear cavity.—adjs. Labyrinth'al, Labyrinth'ian, Labyrinth'ine, related to or like a maze: winding: complicated: confusing; Labyrinth'iform, has a labyrinthine shape: complicated.—n. Labyrinth'odon, an extinct giant amphibian breed found in the Permian, Carbon, and Triassic strata, is called from the mazy pattern exhibited on the transverse part of the teeth of some genera. [Fr. labyrinth—L. labyrinthos; similar to laura, part.] The name Nuttall EncyclopediaLabyrinthintha is given to the sundry structure consisting of winding parts that are so complicated as to make it difficult to find a way out, and sometimes in. Of these the most remarkable structures are the Egyptian and Cretan structures. Egypt to E. Lake Moeris, consisting of an endless number of dark spaces, is connected by a maze of passageways where it is difficult to find the entrance; and Cretan, built by Dædalus, on the example of Minos, to imprison the Minotaur, where the incoming man could not find a way out again except by means of skein thread. That way, given by Ariadne, Perseus (q. v.) found a way out after killing the Minotaur (q. v.).
